is the situation which Miss Warwick develops to the full in the case of each of her characters. She might have made a comedy of it; she has chosen to treat it seriously, from the modern standpoint, which in such circumstances must needs be stripped of much of its theory. In the end the conservative husband naves to he the stances must needs be stripped or much of its theory. In the end the conservative husband proves to be the most modern of them all; the young lover is shown to represent no more than the attraction of youth, even as the has been attracted by beauty and nothing else; but the case of the wom-
